You need to make sure that the doctor has the right qualifications, has the experience and is a good fit for you. This is not an easy task, and you should do plenty of research before making a decision.

First and foremost, you need to find out whether the surgeon is board certified in plastic surgery. If they are, that means they have completed a residency program and passed a written exam before practicing in their chosen field. Having board certification in plastic surgery is essential because it shows that the physician has received training that is above and beyond other doctors, and it also signifies that they have met strict safety standards.

The next thing you need to do is get in touch with previous patients and ask them about their experiences at the clinic and how they would recommend it to others. These patients can provide you with a wealth of information about the clinic's staff, their wait time and their overall comfort level there.

A good plastic surgeon should be able to answer any questions you have about your specific procedure, and should take the time to explain the process in detail. He or she should explain the benefits, risks, and potential complications of your surgery, and should answer any questions you may have about recovery.

You should be able to easily contact the surgeon's office to speak with past and current patients. This can be an important factor in your decision, as it will allow you to see if the doctor is willing to discuss your case with you before the surgery.
